

THE LAST TRANSMISSION

BY

DAVID BROWN

Chapter 1 – The Signal

The forest was alive with the whispers of the night. Crickets sang in rhythmic patterns, an owl hooted somewhere far away, and the cold air wrapped around the campsite like a shroud. Elias Kane sat cross-legged inside his small tent, the glow of his portable radio flickering against his face. The radio was old — an inheritance from his late father — but tonight, it pulsed with a static unlike anything he'd ever heard.

He twisted the dial slowly, his breath fogging in the cool air.

"…—Elias… —come in…—"

He froze.

No one knew he was here.

Not a single soul.

The voice was faint, distorted, but unmistakably calling his name. He pressed the radio to his ear, his heartbeat thundering in his chest. The words came again, more insistent this time, almost mechanical.

“Elias Kane… move to coordinates… 48.7762… -121.8109… Hurry.”

His hand trembled as he scribbled the numbers into his journal. Those coordinates were only a short hike from his current camp, but the urgency in the voice was unsettling. He stepped out of the tent, looked up at the moonless sky, and for the first time in years, felt truly alone.

Chapter 2 – The Light

The forest path was narrow, and Elias had to move carefully to avoid tripping over exposed roots. His flashlight’s beam cut through the fog, revealing twisted silhouettes of pines. Somewhere deep inside him, a primal instinct whispered: Turn back.

But he didn’t.

When he reached the clearing, the air felt… wrong. Heavy, charged, like the moments before a thunderstorm. The crickets had fallen silent. The trees around him swayed without wind.

And then he saw it.

A pale blue beam of light descended from the sky, touching the ground like a finger from the heavens. Within that light floated a thousand tiny particles, swirling upward in a spiral dance. His jaw dropped as the beam brightened, and from above, a massive shape emerged from the darkness — smooth, metallic, and silent. The craft was disk-shaped, its surface gleaming like liquid metal, edges lined with pulsating orbs of light. Elias knew instantly: this was not human technology.

The beam shifted.

It moved toward him.

Before he could run, his feet left the ground.

Chapter 3 – The Abduction

The sensation was unlike gravity letting go — it was more as if the world had vanished beneath him. His limbs hung weightless, his chest tightened, and his breath came in ragged gasps. The beam carried him higher, past the treetops, until the ground was a patchwork of shadows.

The ship's underside loomed above, a vast ring of light surrounding a central opening. As he was pulled inside, Elias's mind screamed questions: Why me? Who sent the signal? What do they want?

Darkness swallowed him.

When light returned, it was cold and sterile. The chamber was vast, walls smooth and seamless, illuminated by a dim blue glow. Strange glyphs flickered across translucent panels in the air — symbols that shifted and rearranged like living code.

A sound echoed — not footsteps, but a resonance, as if the air itself was vibrating.

They appeared from the shadows.

Chapter 4 – The Beings

They were tall — impossibly tall — with elongated limbs and skin the color of pale moonlight. Their faces were smooth, almost featureless, save for deep-set eyes that shimmered with shifting galaxies. No mouths, no ears, yet Elias felt their words directly in his mind.

You heard the call.

It wasn’t a question.

“I… I heard my name,” Elias stammered. “Who are you? How do you know me?”

We have always known you, Elias Kane. Your lineage carries the signal.

They moved closer, their movements flowing like liquid. One raised a long, delicate hand toward his chest, and Elias felt warmth flood his body. Images exploded in his mind: ancient cities, alien skies, colossal ships drifting among stars. He saw a planet, lush and green, orbiting a blue sun — and then, devastation. Firestorms. Shattered continents. Silence.

Our world is gone, the beings continued. But fragments of us remain — scattered across space, hidden in those attuned to our frequency. You are one of them.

Elias's mind reeled. "You mean… I'm not—"

Not entirely human, they finished. You are the bridge.

Chapter 5 – The Mission

A section of the chamber's wall dissolved, revealing an endless expanse of stars. In the distance, a pale blue sphere shimmered faintly, as though wrapped in a veil of light.

That is Lumea — our last refuge, the beings said. But its shield is failing. We need a key to restore it, a key hidden in the genetic code of those like you.

Elias swallowed hard. “Why me? There must be others.”

There are none left on this world. You are the last.

The words struck like ice. The beings extended a crystalline object, pulsing with faint light. It hovered before him, spinning slowly.

This will unlock the gate. You must take it to the coordinates we will send. But beware — others have heard the signal. Not all are allies.

Elias reached out, and the crystal melted into his palm, leaving behind a faint, glowing mark.

Chapter 6 – The Return

The next thing he knew, he was outside again. The ship hovered above the clearing, its light bathing him in a pale glow. And then, without sound, it shot upward into the stars, vanishing in an instant.

Elias fell to his knees, gasping, the forest sounds slowly returning — crickets, wind, the distant hoot of an owl. For a moment, he wondered if it had all been a hallucination… until he looked at his hand and saw the mark, faintly glowing.

Back at his tent, the radio was still on, static whispering softly. Then, a different voice — deeper, harsher.

“Elias Kane… we know what you have. Hand it over, and you may live.”

His blood ran cold.

Chapter 7 – The Chase

By dawn, he was miles from the campsite, the crystal's energy thrumming faintly in his chest. He had no clear plan, only the coordinates burned into his mind and the haunting knowledge that someone was hunting him.

At midday, he spotted them — two figures in matte-black suits, their movements too precise to be human. Their faces were concealed behind mirrored visors, and on their shoulders, strange weapons gleamed.

Elias bolted into the forest.

The chase was relentless. Every time he thought he'd lost them, a flicker of movement or the crack of a branch told him they were near. The mark on his hand burned hotter, guiding him deeper into the wilderness, toward something unseen.

Finally, after hours of running, he stumbled into another clearing. In its center stood a monolith of shimmering metal, covered in the same alien glyphs he'd seen on the ship. The mark on his hand pulsed in time with the glyphs, as if in recognition.

Chapter 8 – The Gate

The black-suited figures emerged from the trees.

"Give us the key," one ordered, their voice cold and metallic.

Elias backed toward the monolith, heart hammering. "Why? What's on the other side?"

The second figure raised their weapon. "Not for you to know."

The mark on his hand blazed with light, and the glyphs on the monolith began to spin, rearranging into a new pattern. The air hummed with power. Before they could fire, Elias pressed his palm against the surface.

A blinding flash engulfed the clearing.

Chapter 9 – Lumea

When his vision cleared, he stood on a cliff overlooking an ocean of shimmering turquoise. Twin moons hung in the lavender sky, and colossal towers of glass and crystal rose in the distance. The air smelled sweet, alive.

Behind him, the black-suited figures were gone. Only the wind remained.

A voice filled his mind — the beings from the ship.

Welcome home, Elias Kane. The gate is open, but danger follows. You must decide: protect this world… or watch it fall.

He looked at the horizon, at the alien beauty of Lumea, and felt the weight of the crystal's power within him. He had been chosen. He didn’t know why, but he knew one thing: he could never go back to the life he had before.

The last transmission had found him — and now, he was part of it.